ABOUT THE BUILDING

Built in 1951 by the NSW Electricity Commission, the Liverpool Powerhouse, was one of a series of identical buildings erected to supplement electricity production during winter and power shortages. The Powerhouse was closed in 1976, and bought by Liverpool Council in 1978. The building became derelict over the following decade, and in 1985, the residents of Liverpool decided by public vote that the building should become an arts centre. By 1987 Council had appointed two staff members to oversee the first capital works program.

In 1993, Casula Powerhouse Arts Centre, as it had then become known, undertook ambitious developments and after a 22 month closure, reopened in 2008 with significantly improved new facilities.

Liverpool Powerhouse now returns to its original name, reclaiming its place as a bold regional destination for arts, culture and events.
